Your letter, however, raises a question that has been slumbering and that should now be disposed of. Your mother and I have not lived together as man & wife for some ten years, but have, and have, tried to keep up appearances, on account of your children. Our differences arose soon after marriage. We had not been raised alike. I had my idea of a home and she had hers. They were different. I believe that a successful husband who brings in the money has as much right to get a room to suit him and those things to east he wishes as if he were paying for it at a boarding house. And he has a right to be his own judge in the matter and not subjected to attempts to warp him to some one else's ideas. I was an early riser, your mother a late riser. I was liberal with my wife in money matters. She was close with me. One of these came under your observation. It was the time when I was eating lunch with my face at the office and sent home for a tea cup of sorghum as he told the man that I ^{should} buy my own molasses. The break came directly after our marriage and gradually widened but was curable up to about ten years ago. But when it finally went home in my breast, it became irreparable, respect remained but love had
